Customer Reviews

With the jobless rate hovering around 10 percent, there are many people looking for work, and a large percentage of those a brand-new career. Ferguson Publishing has issued a 10-volume series called Field Guides to Finding a New Career, with each volume dedicated to a growing part of the U.S. economy. The volumes include Advertising, Sales, and Marketing; Arts and Entertainment; Education; Film and Television; Food and Culinary Arts; Health Care; Information Technology; Internet and Media; Nonprofits and Government; and Outdoor Careers. The four volumes examined for this review are Information Technology; Internet and Media; Nonprofits and Government; and Outdoor Careers. Each volume is organized like a typical field guide and even uses similar terminology. There are 10 or 11 chapters on individual careers, each containing sections such as "Career Compass" (which tells the job seeker what is needed in terms of skills);

"Destination" (a brief overview of the occupation); "Essential Gear" (tools, training, etc.); and "Organizing Your Expedition" (how to break into the career). One of the most important and unique sections for each career is "Landmarks," which offers advice tailored to different age groups, from people in their twenties to those over sixty. "Notes from the Field" provides interviews with people already working in the career. A "Resources" section gives the reader three or four organizations and Web sites for further information. The Field Guides to Finding a New Career series is the perfect resource for anyone needing a good starting point for a career change, and the price is well within the budget of even a small public library. The only quibble is that there is no volume on green jobs. --Jerry Carbone

Amanda Kirk is a freelance writer and has lived and worked in England, Scotland, Ireland, France, Sweden, Italy, Portugal, Russia, and San Francisco. She lives in Hadley, Massachusetts. --This text refers to the Paperback edition.

I gave this book to my teenage nephew as a Christmas gift. I hope it will shed some light on his future.
